THINKING ABOUT ASSISTED LIVING FOR YOURSELF, OR A LOVED ONE?

Making the decision to move a family member into assisted living care can be an emotional task. Above all, you want your loved one to be cared for and safe. Although every situation is different, the list below may give you some indications that it's time to start transitioning to an Assisted Living Care Facility. Some things to think about:

- Recent accidents or reoccurring falls; unexplained bruises and/or skin tears, not knowing where they came from?
- Inability to manage medications properly.

- Concerns about sleep; not sleeping at night or sleeping all day, getting days mixed from morning to night.
- Recent weight loss or gain; changes in eating habits, skipping meals or forgetting they ate and eating again; stale or expired foods in the house; fear of safety using appliances such as the stove, and them starting a fire.
- Developing strange body odors; neglecting personal care, not bathing, wearing the same clothes/dirty clothes for days.
- Withdrawing from social activities they once enjoyed; may go days without leaving their home.
- Driving issues, signs of dangerous driving such as slowed reaction time or mixing up the gas and brake pedals.
- Letting things go around the house; lots of clutter, piles of clothes, dirty dishes, overflowing trash, neglecting pets
- Medical/health concerns or issues; your loved one's primary doctor may share your concerns about safety at home.

Remember that Assisted Living is meant to fill the gap between full independence and skilled nursing. Evaluate your options. Ask questions. Don't wait too long. Assisted living can help maintain your loved one's independence longer, not take it away. If you or your loved one is interested in finding out more about the services and availability at Quail Court, please contact Leslie Gies, Quail Court Manager, at 509-982-2271.
